Re:gendo www.gungendo.co.jp/pages/details/003102.php

A restaurant in a renovated Western-style residential facility (called "bunka jutaku") built in the early 20th century. The place offers sets such as "Musubi-zen," in which the meal contents are changed twice a month, and "Nigiri-yasai-sushi zen."

Using a renovated old house built in the Meiji period and designated as one of the registered tangible cultural properties of Japan. The restaurant offers a lunch set, "Hiru-zen," with 8 kinds of kushiage (deep-fried skewered ingredients) (3,520 yen), a course set with 12 kinds of kushiage (4,730 yen), and various other dishes.

Utilizing the structure and items of an old pharmacy, the café creates a unique space. Its tables and chairs were once used in a cram school for junior high school students. The café offers several lunch sets, including the popular "Baked Omurice" (omlet rice), and homemade sweets (500 yen). ➡ Hikifune Sta. (Tobu)

Although Tokyo bears a strong image of an ad-Editor's note vanced urban city, it has lots of cafés and restaurants in old traditional Japanese-style houses that evoke a historical vibe. When I come across such a store, I take a look at the exterior and pay extra attention to the details of the interior design. I beleieve that Japanese lunch and sweet treats taste better in a nostalgic, retro space. Sometimes you should enjoy a relaxing atmosphere away from the hustle and bustle of the city.
